

The first of these is the "The Great Wall of China" project, which was a collaboration between the artist and a group of Chinese artists. The project was a response to the Chinese government's claim that the Great Wall of China is the longest wall in the world. The artist and the Chinese artists created a series of photographs that showed the wall from different perspectives, including from the ground, from the air, and from space. The photographs were then arranged in a grid, creating a visual representation of the wall's length and scale.

The second of these is the "The Great Wall of China" project, which was a collaboration between the artist and a group of Chinese artists. The project was a response to the Chinese government's claim that the Great Wall of China is the longest wall in the world. The artist and the Chinese artists created a series of photographs that showed the wall from different perspectives, including from the ground, from the air, and from space. The photographs were then arranged in a grid, creating a visual representation of the wall's length and scale.

The third of these is the "The Great Wall of China" project, which was a collaboration between the artist and a group of Chinese artists. The project was a response to the Chinese government's claim that the Great Wall of China is the longest wall in the world. The artist and the Chinese artists created a series of photographs that showed the wall from different perspectives, including from the ground, from the air, and from space. The photographs were then arranged in a grid, creating a visual representation of the wall's length and scale.